The Beauty of Darkness

One of the things that makes Phelps' writing so unique is his ability to find beauty in the darkest of places. His stories are often set in desolate landscapes, filled with decay and death. But even in these bleak settings, Phelps manages to find moments of beauty. He describes the world with a rich, poetic language that brings even the most horrific scenes to life.

For example, in his short story "The House on the Hill," Phelps describes a crumbling mansion that has been abandoned for years. The house is surrounded by a overgrown garden, and the windows are boarded up. It's a place that seems to be frozen in time, and it's easy to imagine the dark secrets that it holds.

“The house was a ruin, but it was a beautiful ruin. The walls were covered in ivy, and the windows were boarded up with rotting wood. The garden was overgrown with weeds, and the trees were bare. It was a place that seemed to be frozen in time, and it was easy to imagine the dark secrets that it held.”
