The Explorers

The first European explorer to reach the source of the Nile River was John Hanning Speke. Speke was a British explorer who led a number of expeditions to Africa in the 19th century. In 1858, Speke and his companion, James Augustus Grant, reached the shores of Lake Victoria. Speke believed that Lake Victoria was the source of the Nile River, and he named it after Queen Victoria of England.

However, Speke's claim was disputed by another British explorer, Richard Francis Burton. Burton believed that the source of the Nile River was Lake Tanganyika. Burton and Speke had a heated debate over the issue, and they never resolved their differences.

In 1864, a third British explorer, Samuel White Baker, reached the shores of Lake Albert. Baker believed that Lake Albert was the source of the Nile River, and he named it after Prince Albert of England. However, Baker's claim was also disputed by Speke and Burton.

The debate over the source of the Nile River continued for many years. However, in 1889, a German explorer, Wilhelm Junker, finally proved that Lake Victoria was the source of the Nile River. Junker's discovery was based on the fact that the water level of Lake Victoria fluctuates with the seasons, which would not be possible if it were not the source of the Nile River.
