With time running out, a wise old wizard steps forward. He whispers a magical spell, and presto! King Louis finds himself standing in the town square, completely naked and exposed to the laughter and mockery of his subjects.

While embarrassment consumes the king, an unexpected hero emerges. A humble laundry maid named Tilly, known for her kindness and courage, steps forward. Dressed in her colorful apron, Tilly offers her own humble clothes to the king, shielding him from the judgmental eyes of the crowd.

In that moment of vulnerability, King Louis realizes the true meaning of acceptance and courage. He accepts Tilly's gift, putting on her simple clothes and embracing his moment of discomfort. As he walks through the town square, the laughter gradually turns into admiration.

Inspired by the king's newfound bravery, the people of Bumpershoot shed their own inhibitions. They dance and sing in the streets, celebrating the king's courage and the power of self-acceptance.
