The Siege of Kohima was one of the most important battles of World War II. Fought in the spring of 1944, it was a desperate struggle between the British Empire and the Japanese Empire for control of the Indian state of Nagaland. The battle lasted for over two months and resulted in heavy casualties on both sides, but ultimately the British were victorious.

The Siege of Kohima began in March 1944, when the Japanese launched an offensive into India. The Japanese hoped to capture the town of Kohima, which was a key strategic location on the road to Imphal, the capital of Manipur state. The British were determined to defend Kohima, and they sent a force of over 10,000 troops to the town.

The Japanese attacked Kohima on April 4, 1944. The fighting was fierce, and the Japanese quickly gained a foothold in the town. However, the British defenders refused to give up, and they launched a series of counterattacks that eventually drove the Japanese out of Kohima.

The Siege of Kohima ended on May 16, 1944, with the British victory. The battle was a turning point in the Burma Campaign, and it helped to secure the Allied victory in the war.
