

The True Story Of An Epic 16,000 Mile Cycle Journey The Length Of The Americas

In 2015, two cyclists set out on an epic journey to cycle the length of the Americas. They traveled from the northernmost point of Alaska to the southernmost point of Argentina, a distance of over 16,000 miles. Along the way, they faced challenges such as extreme weather, difficult terrain, and language barriers. But they also experienced the beauty of the Americas, meeting friendly people and seeing amazing sights. Their journey is an inspiring story of adventure, perseverance, and the power of the human spirit.

The Cyclists

The two cyclists who undertook this epic journey were British adventurers James Bowthorpe and Ed Marchant. James is a former Royal Marine who has cycled across Europe and Asia. Ed is a former professional cyclist who has raced in the Tour de France. They are both experienced cyclists who were well-prepared for the challenges of their journey.

The Journey

The cyclists began their journey in Prudhoe Bay, Alaska, on June 1, 2015. They traveled south through Canada, the United States, Mexico, Central America, and South America. They cycled through deserts, mountains, rainforests, and cities. They faced extreme heat, cold, rain, and snow. They also had to deal with difficult terrain, such as steep hills and rough roads. But they never gave up, and they eventually reached their destination in Ushuaia, Argentina, on December 15, 2015.

The Challenges

The cyclists faced many challenges on their journey. The weather was often extreme, and they had to deal with heat, cold, rain, and snow. The terrain was also difficult, and they had to cycle through deserts, mountains, rainforests, and cities. They also had to deal with language barriers and cultural differences. But they never gave up, and they eventually reached their destination.

The Rewards

The cyclists also experienced many rewards on their journey. They saw amazing sights, met friendly people, and learned about different cultures. They also had the opportunity to push themselves to their limits and to achieve something truly extraordinary. The journey was a life-changing experience for both of them, and they are grateful for the opportunity to have had it.

The Book

The cyclists have written a book about their journey, which is titled The True Story Of An Epic 16,000 Mile Cycle Journey The Length Of The Americas. The book is filled with beautiful photography and engaging storytelling, and it is sure to inspire anyone who reads it. The book is available now on Our Book Library.
